This is a timely book. TÁRKI's first Social Report since Hungary joined the EU, it takes a pan-European look at many of the problems and issues facing Hungary today - from relative computer penetration to the public's attitude to the EU as reflected in voting patterns.

The Social Report 2004 is logically divided into six sections covering social indicators, demographic processes, the labour market, the information society, minorities in Hungary and political behaviour.

A total of 28 papers by highly regarded experts cover aspects of modern life ranging across population issues, economic matters, mobility, prejudices, consumption, housing, technology, ethnic minority issues, education, governance, migration and immigration, and national identity. The range of approaches is refreshingly varied - from the purely descriptive, to year-on-year comparisons, to comparisons across countries. Abundant use is made of diagrams and tables, which are always clearly interpreted in the text. Eminently readable, this stimulating interdisciplinary volume will appeal to academics, researchers, practical sociologists and lay readers alike.
